With stocks collapsing in Europe, Spain's fleet is now plundering waters as far away as Antarctica and Africa using European taxpayers' money, according to a new Greenpeace report. The day before fisheries ministers gather in one of Spain's main fishing hubs to discuss EU fisheries policy reform, Greenpeace activists hung banners from La Coruna's iconic Tower of Hercules reading "EU: Save Our Oceans."

Greenpeace's report, España: The destructive Practices of Spain's Fishing Armada, highlights fisheries mismanagement naming some of the worst Spanish companies and charts a course for policymakers towards sustainable fisheries management. The report states that Spain's fleet has grown into "a voracious armada, representing nearly a quarter of the entire EU fishing capacity".
